Museums had always been the places where people interested in history aimed to get into. Some of them are free to visit, but many are not. There are different points of view on this situation.

Some people believe that access to museums and other cultural places should be free. According to them, the art and history are for the humanity in general, so everyone has his rights for access to them. Not charging for admissions might also make number of people interested in history increase, so the level of knowledge among people would increase too.

There is also another opinion. Some people consider that charging fee for entrance helps private museums exist, and they just cannot become free - their owners are not going to spend their money for it. And if a museum is state, it should not be free too. Because its needs in that case are paid from state fees. But why do not interested in history and art people have to pay for another? It is not necessary for their lives. That is what some people say.

But I am concerned that museums should not charge fee from their visitors - they should charge it from the state even if not belonging to it. I believe that everyone must have an access to the art and history to expand his cultural horizon. Not everybody can afford visiting not free museums, so the state should help them. It is not necessary for their existence, but required by mind aiming to develop.

In Russia, for example, the first steps have already been made - I mean the 'Pushkin card' which contains three thousand rubles to pay for entrance to theatres and museums. I tried it myself and was satisfied.

I find it amazing that people are aiming to become more cultural-educated, so the state should encourage their urge and provide free access to museums, theatres and another cultural places.
